More than three hundred years ago, the Collegiate School in Saybrook was founded with a gift of books. Out of this donation grew today’s Yale, an unsurpassed institution of higher learning with a library that attracts academic luminaries from far and wide. Yale University Library provides the academic community with access to its extraordinarily rich holdings, from special collections of global importance to a vast array of current and past scholarship in print and digital form. For centuries, the Library has served to create, provide, and protect the tools that enable scholars and students to navigate this ever-expanding universe.

The Library depends on both unrestricted gifts and endowment income to help build and preserve its world-class collections while offering a wide range of services for students, faculty, and visiting scholars. The flexible resources provided by current-use funds are especially important to the Library, allowing its collections and services to evolve with the needs and research interests of the campus community.

Become a Library Associate with a gift through the Alumni Fund

From Isaac Newton (who donated the second edition of his Principia in 1715) to the present day, Yale University Library has become an internationally important center for scholarship thanks to the generosity of Yale alumni and friends. If you would like to help uphold this rich tradition, please consider supporting the Alumni Fund for Library Resources. The thousands of students, faculty, and researchers who rely upon the Library each year will thank you. Yale recognizes all donors to the Library as members of the Yale Library Associates, a group of Library supporters founded in 1930 “to help keep the Library in its proper position as a great world-collection of books indispensable to the university whose heart and center it constitutes.”

"Year after year, thousands of students, professors, and researchers turn to the Library for the raw material—literature, data, manuscripts, scholarship—they use to make discoveries, test theories, disprove myths, and teach and inspire others to do the same. As you think about your reunion gift this spring, I hope you will consider making an Alumni Fund gift designated for library resources. By helping sustain and enhance the Library for the Yale community, you will help ensure that ‘knowledge shall be increased’ in this remarkable place for generations to come.”

— Susan Gibbons, University Librarian and Deputy Provost for Collections & Scholarly Communication

For more information about making a gift to the Library through the Alumni Fund, please contact Basie Bales Gitlin, Director of Development for Yale University Library, at basie.gitlin@yale.edu or 203.432.9851.